Crime Case

Corporations are traditionally associated with individuals but today it is well known that they can commit crimes. According to law, corporations are legal persons and can commit crimes and can sue or be sued. The two articles forming the subject of this present essay discuss the nature of this fact. In both cases, big corporate houses are held liable for the crimes committed by their Directors for the benefit of both the company as well as the individual.

The crime committed by the law comprises the crime of felony and not misdemeanor. Felony is said to include serious crimes such as aggravated assault or battery, arson, burglary, kidnapping, and theft, robbery, murder, rape and fraud among other serious crimes. The definition of felony states that persons who actually committed the crime together with persons who advised or abetted the crime, and accessories who helped before and after the crime took place are all guilty of committing the crime of felony.

In both the cases, the Directors of the Company were involved in the crime of fraud and their thereby causing great loss to the public at large. In both cases, the crime was committed by the Directors, while within the scope of their duties and were benefited both by the individual concerned and the Company. Thus in both the cases, we obviously say that the Company should be held liable for the crime committed by its Directors.

The Principles of Federal Criminal Law of Business Organizations as laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Bestfoods, 509 U.S. 423 (2003), should be taken into consideration. The case charging a Corporation with criminal offense principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, 2003, in the case of United States v. Bestfoods, 509 U.S. 423 (2003) in the market where the case was filed later volumes of research and charged that fraudulent account of the Company to increase the credibility of the Company in the stock market (U.S. World Court, 2003).

In the case of United States v. Bestfoods, the Directors had assumed discretionary power by fraudulently stating that there was a shortage in supply thereby trying to regulate the electricity market. During this period it was said that the Company bought many of the reserves primarily supply companies (U.S. World Court, 2003). The crime was of a serious nature where the public is put to great losses due to the fraud perpetrated by the Company.

This again raised the principle of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations as one of the major factors in deciding the criminal liability of a company. Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, 2003. Further in the cases we found evidence that they committed felony and not misdemeanor.

Accountability of responsibility plays a major role in determining liability of a company. In the first case, the crime was very clearly stated by the case and the court.
